

Three problems facing companies on process efficiency projects (1/11/17)

The main purpose of process efficiency projects is to understand which day-to-day activities can be done differently to improve the company's profit margins. In most cases it's the company itself that arrives at the decision to launch such a project, but sometimes the need is pointed out by suppliers, customers, or bankers. This article takes a look at three common practical problems arising on such projects.
